One of the most impressive sights that any traveler can hope to see is the Parthenon in Athens, Greece. It is, without a doubt, Greece's greatest single tourist attraction—and for good reason. It is so overwhelmingly impressive in its total concept that it remains a singular experience for every newcomer to Athens.

Archeologists are now saying that something must be done in order to preserve the life of this symbol of Greece's glorious page in history. What in the world could happen now to a building that has withstood the ravages of war and disasters for 2,500 years? Anything that has remained on earth that long should surely be indestructible.

Not so. Apparently this modern atomic age with its concentration of industrial areas has played havoc with the Parthenon. Athens has become highly industrialized since World War II and the Marshall plan. Air pollution has become a real threat to the marble buildings—old especially the Parthenon. Old corrosion has set in and there seems to be no solution for it.

THE ACROPOLIS is a complex of ruins on the highest mountain overlooking Athens. The Parthenon is only one of these buildings—but actually the most important one and the one that has been able to remain intact. No one should ever climb the rocky path to the Acropolis without first seeing this sight from another hill nearby.

The Parthenon, which actually means "Chamber of the Virgins," was first a Christian church and then a Turkish mosque. The gigantic span actually had cedars of Lebanon as a roof covering the honey colored marble. Who knows when the roof gave way. It could have been in 1687 when Venetian artillery posted on a nearby hill ignited a Turkish powder magazine in the structure.

What a beating it took at that time. Barricades were set up on the Acropolis in 1821 during the Greek war for independence. Damage could have been very heavy during that siege also. Most recent—but of less serious consequence to the Parthenon—was the Communist uprising in 1944 when the British paratroopers had to set up a battery of guns in the ancient temple.

THE GREEKS have long been noted for their high regard for beauty in all of their arts. This ancient concept of classical beauty, being the ideal of artistic expression has remained very strong to the present day. It doesn't have the importance or impact that it once did—especially in 1965, but it still persists.

The Parthenon itself, because it would be seen from just one approach, is a triumph in visual deception. It is first seen from a low angle and off to one side. Because of this unusual visual experience the 46 outer columns are not all set the same distance apart. All of the columns bulge slightly and taper toward the top. The massive pieces of marble that make up a single column were practically laminated together—or at least it seems that way.

The marble floor is so large that they tapered it away from the center to visually make the entire floor more beautiful. So much of our Western culture was born of this spot—many years before the birth of Christ that my first visit to the Parthenon only left me with a desire to return for a longer period.
