(Continued from Page 1) men voted to extend the deadline to March 1, giving Johnson a three-month reprieve. Ferraro had given him the choice of taking the lower position — at an annual salary of about $9,500 — or leaving the city staff, Johnson said.

First appointed in 1962 by the late Wade E. Peebles, who was then city manager, Johnson continued in his post when Ferraro became the city manager in 1963.

FERRARO, in his letter to Johnson, told his aide, "Even the mere suggestion that funds are being solicited for an assistant city manager to be candidate for a City Council position would perhaps imply a loss of respect for our profession and jeopardize the current City Council's respect and confidence for the non-partisan nature of our job."

"It would have been my assumption that you would have taken a leave of absence of your present employment if you had serious considerations of being a possible political candidate," Ferraro added.

For his part, Johnson accused Ferraro of ignoring a council directive in dismissing him from the post.

Johnson admitted a group of friends had been checking on funds to back his possible candidacy. He declined, however, to reveal the names of the backers.

Councilmen cannot usurp the city manager's authority to hire and fire his own aides, however, since the city's top level executive officers are not civil service employees.
