Law in Action

Jim and John's father gave keep the land as his own must up farming in 1937 and deedied the family farm to them is a matter of right, and he jointly. The brothers farmed of a city girl and gave up farming after some bad erop years. Jim was unwilling to put any more money or work into the farm.

He told John that he was through and that if John wanted to carry on alone it was all right with him. John did carry on. He paid off the mortgage, fixed up the farm, built new barns, drilled wells, and so on. John also kept the profits and paid the expenses of his farming business. Having no interest in farming, Jim started his own business in the city.

TWENTY YEARS later a large farming corporation wanted to buy the farm and offered a lot of money for it. All of a sudden Jim took a new interest in the farm.

John asked a court to say that the whole piece of land was.

offered a lot of money for it. All of a sudden Jim took a new interest in the farm.

John asked a court to say that the whole piece of land belonged to him, but the court refused, saying that a each owner has a right to possession of jointly owned property. Just because one of them occupies the land does not give him a claim to all. Half of the property still belonged to Jim. Perhaps Jim would have to contribute to the cost of the permanent improvements, but whether he did or did not he still owned one-half of the land.

Occupying another's land for a long time doesn't give you a permanent claim to it. You might be on it with the own er's permission; you might be a mere squatter, knowing full well that someone else owned the land.
