POISON PREVENTION WEEK

Jolly Roger Has Meaning On Those Bottle Labels

When you see the skull and crossbones on the label of one of your household chemical aids, do you think of Captain Kidd and his crew—or of the crew of your own good ship HOME?

The right answer for the smart housewife is "Both." For the "Jolly Roger"—pirates bold called the skull and crossbones—is just as clear a signal flag of danger today as when buccaners sailed the Spanish Main.

But the skull and crossbones is not the only sign on the label of a household product that should make the user exercise due caution. In fact, Federal law now reserves the use of this particular symbol for only the most poisonous of the household chemicals.

LABELS ON other products may carry such stop signs as "Warning," "Danger," "Caution." These labels mean just what they say. Heeding them can keep the captain, the mate, and the small-ry crew of your family boat sailing in safe seas.

This week has been designated National Poison Prevention Week by proclamation of President Lyndon B. Johnson. This is a good week to learn more about the labeling law that protects you and your children, and, most important, to learn how to put this law to work for you.

Today's housewife has as many chemical servants at her beck and call as Aladdin ever had bottled up in his lamp. All sorts of cleaners and polishes stock her shelves, brighten her home, and lighten her chores. Her do-it-yourself husband has his own workbench of paints and paint thinners and removers, solvents, soldering compounds, fuels, sometimes radiator anti-freeze and similar materials.

BUT HOWEVER handy these household helpers are, many of them contain chemicals that are dangerous in one way or another. Some are poisonous if accidentally swallowed; some are flammable or even explosive; some are caustic and corrosive to the skin; still others are irritants or are strong sensitizers—that is, they may cause one to become allergic to them.

Children are the most frequent victims of accidental poisoning. Ninety per cent of all such poisonings happen to youngsters under five years of age. Every year there are about 500,000 young victims. The secret of keeping household chemicals helpful, not harmful, lies in the information on the label of the product. Before 1960, only a very few caustic poisons were subject to Federal labeling requirements. In that year Congress passed the much broader Federal Hazardous Substances Labeling Act. Enforcement was assigned to the Food and Drug Administration, U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

"Where the Customer Is King"

THE LAW requires certain specific information on the label of any household product which is potentially dangerous:

- What's in the product that makes it harmful—necessary information for the doctor in case of injury.
- How it can harm—"flammable," "vapor harmful," "poison," etc.
- Special words to flag the hazard—"DANGER," "WARNING," "CAUTION,"—and skull and crossbones if highly toxic.
- What to do to avoid harm.
- What first aid to apply in case of accident—if first aid on our part is indicated.
- The statement "KEEP OUT OF THE REACH OF CHILDREN."

OF COURSE, the wise label reader does not stop at reading the label. She acts on the information it conveys.

Here are a few handy do's and don'ts for users of chemical household aids:

- Lock up all dangerous substances.
- Never transfer poisonous substances (kerosene, gasoline, rat poison, etc.) to food and beverage containers. These containers mean food and drink to the small child.
- Be sure you have adequate ventilation when using paints, solvents, finish removers, and other volatile liquids. Avoid breathing vapors.
- When you throw away hazardous materials, be sure the discarded contents cannot be reached by children and pets.
- Read all labels and follow all caution statements and again, "KEEP OUT OF THE REACH OF CHILDREN."
