... Let's Go

By LARRY MACARAY

CAIRO—I am sitting on my balcony in the Nile Hilton Hotel overlooking the Nile River and watching thousands of people along the banks of the river celebrating Egypt's Day of Revolution. The river is so close that I could almost throw a rock into it from here.

It is dusk and fireworks have been going off continually. It sounds like a festive crowd — much the same atmosphere that we might have on a Fourth of July celebration. There are flags everywhere—red, white, and black stripes with two stars in the center.

Our hotel is overflowing with "top brass." They must be having some sort of reception and I heard that Nassar himself will be here later—think I'll take a look and find out. He gave a long speech here in Cairo last night and I heard it on the radio in the square along with thousands of Egyptians.

THE PYRAMIDS were exciting to see today. It was very tiring climbing inside of them though. I went up halfway in the largest Pyramid of Giza and that almost killed me. Part of the way was climbing in a crouched position—had a hard time keeping my feet on.

The real display of fireworks has just started and it outdoes Disneyland's Fourth of July display. Such a performance. From my eighth-floor balcony it gives me a view of several miles of the Nile—plus all the activity is taking place right in front of me.

Nassar just passed with a police escort. The crowd is getting heavier and noisier. Horns are blowing and fireworks keep going on and on. Hundreds of pleasure boats are cruising up and down the Nile and it's an exciting thing to witness.

THE CAMEL RIDE to the Pyramids was fun. I had a camel driver who kept "bugging" me for a "tip" so I gave him some money and he took pictures of me on the camel. It was easy riding and I enjoyed it very much. Camels are so slow and graceful when they sit you down.

What a contrast. The pyramids and the Sphinx—wait—a final barrage of fireworks and guess what's left—a picture of Nassar in lights—there's no doubt who runs this country. I started to say that the contrast I saw today was startling—pyramids on the ground and hundreds of Egyptian jets flying in formation overhead.

THIS COUNTRY is tough on the tourist coming in and I suppose going out. We have to account for every penny we exchange and submit all the receipts when we leave. India was like that, so we know that there must be a big black market flourishing here, too.

Can't really feel as though we are too welcome here in Egypt, but maybe they still like our American dollars. Pictures of Nassar are everywhere. The shops hang them—even the smallest vendor on the street has at least one large photograph of him — they come in assorted poses and uniforms. Can't believe it—but it's true.

As usual, the traffic is hectic and the Egyptians are very proud of their motorcars. The streets are wide and I was almost run over twice last night crossing the streets! This Hilton Hotel is good, but after staying in the Hong Kong Hilton — nothing else seems to be as good. Off to Jerusalem tomorrow morning.
