

UCLA Medical Professor Whacks Quacks at Meeting

The psychology behind the cancer patient's visit to the quack was discussed by Carl Sugar, M.D. assistant clinical professor at the U.C.L.A. Medical School, during a recent state-wide American Cancer Society meeting at the International Hotel.

Education and service directors from many counties in the state heard Dr. Sugar say that fear is a major reason for visits to quacks. Fear among adults, he said, is the fear of being dependent upon someone else, the fear of losing a part of the body through surgery, and the fear of death.

Dr. Sugar explained this fear in adults manifests itself in the adult patient by a tendency to revert back to fantasies of childhood. When confronted with a diagnosis of cancer, adult patients may want to believe in and reach for magical answers to problems. The patient begins to combine wishful thinking with fact, according to Dr. Sugar.

Suggestions for counteracting this fear were outlined by Dr. Sugar. He advocated public education through the newspapers and radio and TV stations, stronger health programs at the high school level, and community action which would stress that cancer is curable when diagnosed early.

Animal photographers resort to tricks when they are handling their subjects as often as not. That is how they achieve some of their best shots. A strategically placed piece of meat will do wonders in attracting a dog's attention. A cat will hungrily lick the rim of fishbowl that's been rubbed with cod-liver oil and give an impression of being ravenous for its contents.
