...Rome: The Eternal City

I was happy to note on my return to the States that, for the first time in recent years, the Communist lost, rather than gained, ground in the big cities. It is, I think, because Communists can no longer promise urban Italians things they do not have.

Cars are plentiful in the cities of Italy. There is much new building, and jobs are becoming more plentiful. The standard of living is rising—as it is throughout Europe—and with the new affluence, has come an indifference to the harangues of the Communists.

Italy still has problems, make no mistake about that. It would be foolish to believe the prosperity of Rome—or Florence or Milan or Venice—is reflected throughout Italy. It is a long road which Italians must travel, but they are taking the first—and the longest—steps.

But if the sweet life has changed the influence of the Communists (and, I fear, one election cannot offer full proof of that), it has not changed the basic Roman temperament. The fiery, romantic, Roman is legendary—and a fact. The greatest sport in all of Rome—as we have all been told—is girl watching. And what a sport!

Participants need a table at one of Rome's sidewalk cafes, a glass of beer (or a spot of tea, if you prefer), and good vision. It's a great way—and the most common way—to spend an afternoon.

Here food reflects the sweet life, too, in great quantity and great quality. "It's the climate," one Roman explained to me. "It's so hot that you can't drink all the time, so we eat."

While Rome lives in the present and eyes the future with confidence, she has not forgotten her past. What school boy does not know something of her past? The Colosseum still stands, perhaps as Rome's most majestic link with her past. Now circled by a magnificent boulevard, the Colosseum was once the scene of many gladiator battles—and once in a while it was even filled with water for the amusement of emperors who liked to watch naval battles.

And this is the place to debunk one of the most common misconceptions about ancient Rome. Not a single Christian was ever fed lions in the Colosseum! That slaughter took place on Nero's Circus—which stood once on the same ground where now stands St. Peter's Basilica.

Across from the Colosseum stand the ruins of the Roman Forum, heart of ancient Rome. Preserved throughout the years, they tell the story of Rome's greatness as capital of the Western world.

Here are the memories of pagan Rome, a testament to the energy, the power, and the glory of this city.

From the Palatine, first of the original Seven Hills, you see spread before you the great city, now spanning 12 hills and still growing. Let your mind's eye wander: this city has survived fire and war and plague; it has survived the intrigues of popes and emperors and petty princes; it has survived revolutions and dictatorships.

It may be that "The Eternal City" is not such a cliché after all, for Rome does seem to be eternal.
