I have new respect for those "Success Stories" you read about in "Reader's Digest" type articles which tell about a housewife who starts out making her own bread. Word spreads about its homespun goodness — "Martha, you ought to start selling this. It's delicious!"

Next, she has her kids out selling it door-todoor and before long she owns 75 nation-wide branches, factories, affiliates and a seat on the New York Stock Exchange.

My trouble is that whenever anyone praises my cooking it turns out that it's something that was frozen or pre-packaged.

But even with my latest venture, baking my own bread, I can't see us making a fortune. I know this much, those women in the success stories can't have as many interruptions per day as I do, as evidenced by the daubs of dough I inadvertently leave around the house. It seems that every time my hands are working the dough I have to either answer the phone or the doorbell or drive my kids someplace.

And how do these mothers get their children to peddle their wares? I can just see me telling our teen-agers, "I've decided to market my homemade just like the one in the article, "How We Took a World Cruise on my Sesametop Bread Earnings.

Of course, my kids wouldn't be able to take more than two orders at a time, because a total of two loaves per day seems to be my quota. I keep thinking if I bake more, that is, go into mass production with four loaves, it won't taste the same,

I'd probably have to sell it for $3.50 a loaf, considering the time I'd put into it. Physical as well as emotional.

But even if I never sell a loaf, baking one's own bread does have its own advantages. For one thing, it bolsters your image as a homemaker in an age of packaged cake mixes and flakes that turn into mashed potatoes.

Moreover, it adds something to a conversation to be able to mention, "Good grief, it's 2 o'clock. I must tend to my bread." To me, it carries the same impressive connotation as saying, "I must return to my loom. I'm weaving coats for my children this afternoon.
