Coffee Break

By Adeline Daley

You have to hand it to those Washington correspondents. They're able to take an offhand remark, such as, "See yah!" uttered by a high official and find a hidden meaning in it that escapes the ordinary person.

For example, when President Johnson was quoted as telling a group of senators that "he hoped to see them around," it was interpreted by at least one news analyst that it indicated "LBJ plans to run for a seat in the U.S. Senate."

You can imagine what a disappointment the news items must have been to the wives of some of the senators who undoubtedly took the statement as an invitation to spend two weeks at the ranch. Although, if I were one of the wives I would have preferred, "Drop in when you're in the neighborhood."

In order not to commit himself, however, it might have been better if Mr. Johnson had said something like, "Don't take any wooden nickels" to the senators. But then the Washington pundits would have interpreted it as a policy-making statement on our fiscal policy.

In competition with my seven children, however, these Washington seers would be left waiting at the post. Because they can read meanings into statements attributed to me that I hardly recognize from the original text.

"We'll think about it," for instance, is always translated into the affirmative on any answer I give regarding the acquisition of new clothes for them, the possibility of one of them getting the car that evening or to the perpetual query: Are we going to Disneyland this summer?

It isn't that I don't appreciate their optimistic outlook on life. But when my reply of "I doubt it" is STILL construed as the proposal having 7 to 5 favorable odds, I object.

As a result, I have to weigh both my casual remarks and clichés carefully. Just like President Johnson. If I were to tell mine, "Don't take any wooden nickels," they'd extend their palms out for a dime.

Of course, I'll have to admit that I, too, read between the lines, although not always as optimistically. For when someone looks at a pair of shoes I've just bought and then announces, "I'll bet they're real comfortable," I don't find much comfort.

And what, pray tell, do people mean when they look at your kids and supposedly compliment you by saying, "At least they're healthy?"
