Coffee Break By Adeline Daley

I never realized that there were so many rock 'n' roll radio stations on the air until I turned on our car radio one day and noticed that every button I pushed brought in nothing but "Top Thirty" music.

It was later shown, however, that the teenagers in the family have a habit of pre-setting the buttons to stations which play their type of music exclusively

Tell me, why do teenagers seldom seem content to listen to a song in its entirety? When they talk about the "fickle finger of fate," it must mean a teenager poised at the centrols of a car radio. At least the ones in this family who seem to think that another station might be playing a record more to their liking.

They even prefer certain passages of songs over others and when it's over, "Zwoop," the station selector is sent to another spot on the dial. in order to catch another song with a higher voltage electric guitar rendition.

Actually, I don't mind because the music sounds pretty much alike. I get annoyed when a news bulletin comes on: "Enemy plancs have been sighted over Newfoundland . . . " which would merely cause my kids to quickly push the button to try to find a station still playing music.

I pity those poor disc jockeys whose bon mots are lost with kids like mine who won't let them utter more than the name of the song and possibly where it is heading on the "Top Thirty." Or as happened in the great year-end round-up recently, "The Top 100 Hits of 1967."

It's a little astonishing that 100 songs were even composed in 1967 for teenagers consumption much less tabulated as "hits." Of course, teenagers, being as fickle as they are, will claim a song one week as their top favorite and the next week you will hear a disc jockey referring to the same song as an "oldie but a goodie."

In a way I can't help but wish good old Snooky Lanson was back with the Hit Parade which had only 10 songs to keep track of. In situation, showing why neurologically handicapped children need special education and how they receive it. also illustrates the signs f this disorder, and how parents, doctors and teachers may be alerted for it.
